Knowledge Mobilization and Communications Lead

Annie Lamontagne completed her Ph.D. and Masters at the Center for Research and Graduate Studies on the Americas of the University of Brasilia (2009-2015). She graduated in Political Science (major) and Communication (minor) from the University of Ottawa (1996). Her studies taught her the theory and practice of interdisciplinarity, as well as institutional logics of action in economic sociology, essential to tackle complex research questions. This has instilled multi-dimensional communication and organizational skills and a passion for broader, yet rigorous research in new fields of study, change process, knowledge diversity, as well as identifying the challenges of different discourses and disciplines pioneering our evolving knowledge.

Her professional experience includes international development, training and coordination work for health innovation as Head of Global Growth at Hacking Health, as well as for education and human rights NGOs in Canada, Brazil, Czech Republic and Belgium. Her main areas of interest are health innovation, institutional logics (institutional analysis), corporate social responsibility, impact assessment, human rights and interethnic conflicts management. She uses her understanding of stakeholders needs to build communities at the intersection of health and technology.
